SECTION A: UNSEEN PASSAGE

Long ago, in a quiet town by the river, lived a boy named Arjun. Unlike others his age, he was fascinated not by games but by books. Every evening, he sat beneath an old banyan tree with a lantern, reading tales of explorers, scientists, and inventors. The townsfolk often laughed, saying, “What use are these stories?” Yet Arjun believed that knowledge could light paths even darker than the night.

One stormy evening, when the river threatened to flood the town, panic spread. People ran with buckets and sandbags, unsure of what to do. Arjun, recalling a story he had read about ancient dams, suggested building a temporary barrier of stones and logs. Though hesitant, the townsfolk followed his idea. To their surprise, the barrier held, and the floodwaters receded.

From that day forward, the townspeople no longer mocked Arjun. They realized that books could indeed turn ordinary minds into problem solvers. Arjun continued reading, dreaming that one day he too would write stories—stories that might save someone else in need.
